

How To Avoid Stress Eating and Drinking During Times of Crisis

TIP SHEET

Working from home has its perks, but potential weight gain and alcohol over consumption should not be one of them.

As more employees work remotely because of the ongoing COVID-19 outbreak, a combination of job stress, financial concerns, the uncertainty surrounding public health and having easy access to the refrigerator and liquor closet could prompt some workers to over-indulge more than they would otherwise.

It's called "stress eating and drinking" for a reason. A number of studies show that emotional or physical distress increases the amount of food we eat, particularly meals higher in fat, sugar or both. Anytime you're feeling particularly stressed out — whether it's at work or at home — and you're feeling aimless, human nature leads us to what's comfortable. Furthermore, not having to commute to work and the ability to wake up later can also throw off your mealtimes and otherwise established healthy habits.

WHY?

Sometimes people eat and drink in excess after they've gone through a major stressful event, like a divorce or losing a job or living through a pandemic. While stress and anxiety induced over-indulgence is not common but often temporary, it may have both short term and long-term consequences.

GOOD NEWS! Emphasis on daily healthy habits and focus on being active (step counts), will help keep the weight and drinking regrets away.

Stop Doing

Skipping meals It disrupts your daily routine and may cause overeating at next meal

Eating out of boredom

Keeping junk food in the house/plain sight Easy access to junk food, packaged goods will test will power and humans have limited will power capacity (seeing a bag of potato chips or a cookie in your line of vision makes it that much more tempting to get up and snack

Drinking any alcohol during work hours You wouldn't do it in the office so don't do it working from home

Sacrificing sleep Don't let daily duties and late-night activities get in the way of your sleep schedule

Drinking when you feel stressed Replace that drink with a healthy habit; go for a walk, do a home workout

Focusing on negativity Being tempted to partake in negative behaviors you might see on social media in response to crisis; use social media to connect positively with your friends/colleague

Start Doing

Keep food diary

Eat regular meals and snacks throughout day

Portion out food Don't just grab a big bag of chips and head to the couch to watch TV. Measure out one serving into a small bag or onto a plate. You'll be less likely to eat too much if you have to get up for more

Think about why you're overeating Adhere to a regular eating schedule

Stay hydrated Don't wait until you're thirsty. Feeling thirsty indicates that you're already dehydrated. Carry a reusable bottle throughout the day

Stock up on fruits and veggies for healthy snacks. A healthy daily consumption of fruits and vegetables can prevent cravings and keep you satisfied throughout the day

Prep meals ahead of time to make available later when impulse to eat something unhealthy from the shelf sets in.
